

FRIENDSHIP AND LOVE.

Of every sensation true joy can impart,
To soothe the keen sorrows of life ;
There's none can such pleasures convey to the heart,
As that of a friend and a wife.

For O ! what fond transports that bosom must prove,
Which boasts the enjoyment of friendship and love.

Should fortune prove kind, a friend's wants are reliev'd,
Till plenty once more is his guest ;
Should she frown, from that friend the same blessing's
(receiv'd,

While pleasure succeeds in each breast,
Then O ! what fond transports that bosom must prove,
Which boasts the enjoyment of friendship and love.

Though the blessings of friendship the bosom may warm,
Still love gives an equal relief ;

In health—the inspirer of every soft charms:

In affliction—the pillow of grief.

Then O ! what fond transports that bosom must prove,
Which boasts the enjoyment of friendship and love.
